On 6 February, Dogma launches their book Urban Villa, co-published by Black Square and Flanders Architecture Institute. As part of the event, Carles Baiges Camprubí, from the architects' cooperative Lacol, will give a lecture on their practice and get in dialogue with Martino Tattara and Pier Vittorio Aureli of Dogma. The event explores how architectural design adds quality to collective living and how architects expand their roles via organising with communities and negotiating with the public authorities. While the lecture of Carles Baiges Camprubí, from Lacol, provides insights into examples in Spain, Dogma shares their approach to collective housing in various geographies with a focus on the urban villa type.

The Urban Villa is a continuation of Dogma's years-long research on housing typologies and their contemporary interpretations. The book is composed of historical research on the urban villa type from the 16th century to today and urban villa designs by Dogma. It also provides insight into the existing norms and regulations about housing policies in Belgium.
